Background

In June 2014 Georgia, Moldova and Ukraine are expected to sign Association Agreements, including Deep and Comprehensive Free Trade Areas, with the EU, concluding years of negotiations and preparations. These agreements open new opportunities for business in the partner countries and the EU. They will stimulate competition and require redoubled reform efforts. As a consequence of this momentous step, a more diversified trade regime between the EU and the Eastern European countries will emerge, since Armenia, Azerbaijan and Belarus pursue alternative strategies, for now.

The purpose of this conference in Kyiv is to discuss the mutual benefits offered by the AA/DCFTAs. Many estimates have been put forward of the economic effects the DCFTAs on countries' trade, income, employment etc. Forecasts for particular sectors as well as specific industries or companies have been presented.

While there may be short-term costs involved in the transition process that need to be addressed, all estimates point toward significant gains in trade and income in the medium and long run. The longer perspective includes many dimensions that go far beyond the direct effects on trade and income. It includes institutional change that contributes to building modern societies where citizens can prosper and enjoy a free choice in a democratic and transparent environment. Other countries have gone through similar transition processes, not least in the context of EU integration. There are lessons to be learned that are relevant for thinking about the Eastern Partnership beyond the DCFTAs.

Speakers and participants

Speakers will come from both academia and the policy sphere and include representatives from EU and Eastern Partnership countries, independent research organizations, IFIs and private companies in an event that will be open to civil society, media, and other interested parties.
